A key Hill staffer asks you explain the main takeaways from a lengthy report recently released by your organization.

A state policymaker requests a 2-5 page policy brief on "what works" in turning around low-performing schools.

An education reporter asks for your quick take on a new federal policy initiative in your area of expertise.

How do you respond to these types of requests accurately but succinctly?

The panel will explore how to effectively communicate complex research findings with policymakers and media. Learn to avoid common mistakes and how to become a trusted expert.